How Do You Recognise When a Betting Market Is Over

Sometimes one surprising result seems to cause a significant change in the prices for a team's next match. I wonder whether bookmakers occasionally adjust too aggressively based on a single performance. Do you look for situations where the market may be overreacting? How do you distinguish a temporary reaction from a genuine change in a team's strength?

I always look for market overreactions right after cup matches, especially when a favorite rotates half their squad and drops points. Casual bettors assume the team is falling apart, so prices drift way too far for their next league fixture. From my experience, watching full match highlights tells you far more than a final scoreline ever will. I usually keep https://gsb.ug/sportsbook/live open on my sport betting site during early minutes to spot whether a sluggish start is just fatigue or real tactical trouble.
